Platonism was the philosophy name for it's founder, Plato of Athens (circa 427–347 B.C.), the pupil of Socrates. Plato was convinced that absolute standards of virtue and truth existed, that goodness came from true wisdom, and that evil came from ignorance and folly.^[1]

His system is basically one of idealism, or rationalism. Plato thought what we experienced on earth was but an imperfect expression of what existed ideally, in the realm of the spirit. For him things material and physical were less perfect than that which was spirit and eternal. His philosophy had a significant and negative impact on the development of Christian thought from the second century until Aquinas in the 13th century.

Neo-Platonism. A recently coined term, Neo-Platonism describes a philosophical school that began with Plotinus (A.D. 204–270) and lasted into the sixth century. Rooted in the writings of Plato, Plotinus' Six Enneads introduced religious and mystical elements into Platonic philosophy, especially with regard to cosmology and creation narratives. Neo-Platonic concepts influenced several early church fathers and are clearly evident in the works of Augustine of Hippo. A fully developed synthesis of Christian and Platonic philosophy emerged in the work of Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite during the early sixth century AD.^[1]

Aristotelianism. The philosophy of Aristotle (384–322 B.C), a pupil of Plato. Aristotle rejected the idealism, rationalism of Plato, and substituted empiricism, knowledge comes through the senses, through what we can see, taste, touch, hear, smell.

In the thirteenth century Aquinas introduced Aristotelian philosophy into Christian thought, replacing the influence of Plato.
